

Chapter 1: The Encounter

The fog permeated the entire street. It was so thick that it obscured the surroundings.

Even in the dense fog, a figure still moved with purpose. Gehrman Sparrow, with

Beneath the pale moonlight, a solitary boat was being pushed forward by the ebb and flow of the tide. "What's the meaning of this?" he asked, his voice laced with suspicion. "Why are

As the boat drifted into the harbor, the fog seemed to thin. A few dim lights flickered in the distance, illuminating the silhouettes of a few piers. The man in the black coat did not answer. He merely stood there, his head bowed

The boat gradually docked. The young man who had been sitting in the stern, staring blankly at the sea, finally stirred. This man was the leader of the Knights of Judgment, the strongest individual in the

He finally raised his head, his eyes, which had been previously downcast, now fixed on the sea. He had a tall and slender build, with a pale complexion and a sharp face. His eyes, the color of the sea, were as deep and unfathomable as the ocean. "I am here to apprehend you."

He disembarked from the boat, his figure disappearing into the night. With those words, the man took a step forward. The faint moonlight illuminated his path. This was the second time he had arrived at this place. This time, he was here to find someone.

Gehrman Sparrow's eyes narrowed. "Apprehend me? For what reason?" He had a name, a name whispered in the shadows and feared by many: The Spectator.

The man in black continued to advance, his steps unwavering. "You have been hidden in the depths of the abyss of his memories.

Gehrman Sparrow's eyes widened in disbelief. "Sefirah Castle? I don't know what you are talking about." He was a traveler, a wanderer, a seeker of lost souls. He had seen empires rise and fall, civilizations flourish and decay. He had witnessed the rise of gods and the fall of demons.

The man scoffed. "Do not play ignorant with me, Gehrman Sparrow. Your actions have consequences. He had also seen the birth of miracles and the despair of damnation.

Gehrman Sparrow, however, was not intimidated. He stood his ground, his gaze fixed on the man. Yet, he remained, a silent observer in the grand tapestry of existence.

The man in black smiled faintly. "Oh, I will prove it. And when I do, you will regret your actions." He walked through the streets, the scent of salt and fish clinging to the air. The city was quiet, its inhabitants seemingly lost in slumber.

He then raised his hand, and a blinding light erupted from it. The fog swirled and dissipated. He passed by dark alleyways and dimly lit taverns, his senses on high alert. He was looking for a specific individual, a person who held a key to his past. Gehrman Sparrow braced himself, his body tensing. He knew that this was no ordinary Part 2 The Confrontation A powerful mystic who had once been a close friend. Her name was Lyra, and she was said to possess the power to read the hearts of men and see the threads of fate.

The confrontation was swift and brutal. The man in black, Justice, moved with blinding speed. He had heard rumors of her whereabouts, whispers of her involvement in the shadows of the city. He had followed these rumors, hoping to find her and unravel the mysteries of his past.

Justice's attacks were relentless. He used a combination of physical prowess and mystical abilities. As he ventured deeper into the city, he felt a strange energy emanating from a nearby building. It was a grand structure, its facade adorned with intricate carvings and arcane symbols. "You are strong," Gehrman Sparrow admitted, his voice strained. "But you are not invincible."

Justice merely smirked. "We shall see about that."

He then unleashed a powerful strike, sending Gehrman Sparrow flying backward.

He approached the building, his instincts telling him that he was close to his destination.

He pushed open the heavy wooden doors and stepped inside.

The interior was dimly lit, the air filled with the scent of incense and ancient scrolls. A woman sat at a table, her back to him, her long, silver hair cascading down her back.

She turned, her eyes, the color of amethyst, locking onto his. A faint smile played on her lips.

"I've been expecting you," she said, her voice as soft as a whisper.

He stood silent, his gaze fixed on her. He knew that his journey was about to begin.

"I absolutely disagree!"

Audrey sat silently in her room, while in the study in the distance, the angry roar of her father, Earl Hall, made her flinch involuntarily.

It was the third day after she awakened, and even her second elder brother, Alfred, who had a long-term position in the army, had specifically taken leave to rush back. Before heading to the study to discuss with their father, he made a special trip to his younger sister's room to briefly share the information he had gathered in the army regarding Sentry and Guide.

Alfred chuckled a little reluctantly, "That's indeed the case. Actually, Father always hoped that our family would produce a Sentinel or a Guide, which would have made things better. Eldest Brother entered politics, and I joined the military. If one of us two had awakened, it wouldn't have mattered. You just needed to be safe and happy. But who would have thought... However, if it were you, the impact of that law wouldn't be as significant."

Alfred shook his head, his expression becoming extremely solemn. "What are you thinking now?"

But fate would not have it, and eight months before Audrey came of age, she awakened as a Guide.

Even though becoming a Guide was something to be proud of, and with the constant friction between Ruen and Fesac on the border, where war could break out at any moment, Audrey's awakening meant that she would be assigned the most suitable Sentinel in advance, and there was a high probability that she would be sent to the front lines with her Sentinel.